

ADVANCE INFORMATION

Grace Maddrell first went on school strike for the climate at the age of thirteen and has since become a passionate activist for equality and climate justice. Grace was first inspired to tweet asking for contributions to what became Tomorrow Is Too Late in November 2019, two months after marching in the September global climate justice strike.

Grace Maddrell is home-schooled and lived in Somerset in the South West of England at the time of compiling Tomorrow Is Too Late, and will be available for events throughout 2021. Find Grace on Twitter: @ElmGrace.

In Tomorrow Is Too Late, Grace Maddrell collects testimonies of activism and hope from young climate strikers, from Brazil and Burundi to Pakistan and Palestine. These youth activists are experiencing the reality of the climate crisis, including typhoons, drought, flood, fire, crop failure and ecological degradation, and are all engaged in the struggle to bring these issues to the centre of the world stage.

Their strength and determination show the urgency of their cause, and their understanding that the generations above them have failed to safeguard their environment.

With contributors aged between eight and twenty-five, this is an inspiring collection of essays from the most vital generation of voices in the global struggle for climate justice, and offers a manifesto for how you can engage, educate, and inspire change for a more hopeful future.

- An inspiring and urgent manifesto of climate essays collated by home-schooled, fifteen-year-old activist Grace Maddrell, publishing in the lead up to COP26
- Passionate, powerful, and persuasive essays from writers aged eight to twenty-five, drawn from countries including Iran, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Kenya, Uganda, Russia, Canada, and Argentina
- The first collection of its kind, written by the climate leaders of tomorrow, with strong crossover appeal to a young adult and younger audience
- Features an essay from Vanessa Nakate, whose book A Bigger Picture will be published in November 2021 by Pan Macmillan / One Boat
